Mary Walton and the Noisy Trains

- 1 Clang, clang, clang! Groaning, Mary Walton buried her head under her pillow. It was no use trying to sleep. The sound of New York City's Elevated Railway, or "El," shook the entire apartment.
- 2 At breakfast Mary watched the milk in her glass quiver. She said to her father, "Papa, I know the El trains are essential. Almost everyone in the city rides them to work. But why do they have to be so noisy?" "I don't know, Mary," her father replied. "There's a challenge for you. Maybe you can find a way to make the trains run quietly."
- 3 Mary's father believed that girls had a right to an education just as boys did. He made sure Mary finished high school even though, in the 1880s, girls often left school at age sixteen to go to work. Knowing she had a good mind that was meant to be used, Mary began to consider the problem at hand. She went to the railway office to see what she could learn. "Has anyone found a way to solve the problem of the noisy El trains yet?" she asked the railway man.
- 4 "Miss, if you could tell me how to make the El trains quieter, I'd shake your hand," he answered. He leaned forward. "Let me tell you something. The railway will pay good money to the person who comes up with the answer. I hear some of the top inventors in the country, even Thomas Edison himself, are trying to find a solution."
- 5 Mary sighed. If the great Thomas Edison hadn't been able to find an answer, how could she? Still, Mary knew this invention was important; its benefits would be great. People worked hard. They needed a way to get to work, but they also needed calm, quiet, and good sleep! She began to ride the El trains during every spare minute. She walked underneath the high tracks, looking up to see how they were made. Watching and listening, Mary considered the problem.
- 6 She still hadn't found a solution when spring turned to summer, the worst time of year for train noise. Opening the windows helped to cool the hot apartment, but the noise of the train was unbearably loud with the windows open.
- 7 One night Mary made a little tunnel of pillows and put her head in the middle. "Maybe this will muffle the sound," she thought. Suddenly she sat up, eyes sparkling, and said, "That's it! I need a way to muffle the sound!" What material could do that? Rocks were too hard to absorb sound. Wood wasn't sturdy enough. Mary snapped her fingers. "What about sand? If we put the rails in sand and find a way to keep the sand together, it might work."
- 8 Mary spent many nights at the library. Finally she came up with a system to bed the rails in sand that was contained in asphalt. Mary wrote up her plans and sent them to the Patent Office in Washington, D.C. She also sent the railway company a letter describing her invention and how it worked.
- 9 Weeks passed, and Mary began to think nothing would happen. One day two men appeared at the door. "The president of our railway company wants to thank you for your invention," they said. "Here's a check for ten thousand dollars." Mary could hardly believe it. That was a lot of money! There would be more to come, too, as other railway stations with elevated railways used her invention.

- 10 One day, Mary went back to the railway office. "It looks like the problem got solved," she said.
- 11 The railway man nodded. "By a young woman. Made her rich, I hear."
- 12 "Yet there's still one payment she hasn't collected," Mary said, holding out her hand. "You promised to shake my hand!"

The Woman Behind Little Women

LOUISA MAY ALCOTT

- 1 One of America's best-known and most-loved authors is Louisa May Alcott. She wrote poems, plays, short stories, and books. For over a hundred years, her works have been popular among both adults and children. How did Alcott become a famous writer?
- 2 Born in 1832, Alcott grew up in Massachusetts with her three sisters. From an early age, she loved to write. She would think up wonderful stories that she turned into plays. Alcott and her sisters acted out the dramas. Alcott always played the most exciting parts: ghosts, bandits, and evil queens. She also loved playing and wandering outdoors. In fact, she was considered quite a "tomboy." In those days, girls were expected to be ladylike, which meant mostly sitting around looking pretty. This was not Alcott's way! She once said that no boy could be her friend until she had beaten him in a race. Girls had to climb trees and leap fences with her if they wanted to be her friends.
- 3 Alcott's family was poor. At age fifteen, Alcott decided to help out. However, it was not easy for women to find work in the 1800s. Alcott worked at any job she could find. She took care of children, she taught, and she washed laundry for other people.
- 4 Alcott's love of writing was always an essential part of her. She believed that it was as much a right and duty for women to do something with their lives as it was for men. So, wanting to work and loving to write, she began her career as an author. Her first poem was published in a magazine in 1852. She didn't earn a lot of money for that first work. She was on her way, though, to a career that would bring her fame—and bring the security that she had wanted for her family. They soon would be free from worry about earning a living.
- 5 Alcott wrote from her own life experiences and from her imagination. During the Civil War, Alcott volunteered to work as a nurse. She wrote about this work in her book Hospital Sketches. She also wrote thrillers that were full of suspense. When her publisher asked her to write a book for girls, Alcott turned to her own life.

- 6 It was then, in 1868, that she wrote what was to become her most popular book, Little Women. The novel is set in New England during the Civil War. It tells the story of four sisters growing up. The family is very similar to the Alcotts. The book's main character, Jo, is based on Alcott herself. Like Alcott, Jo is a determined young woman with a mind of her own. The book was an instant success. It is still popular today and has been made into a movie. Alcott also wrote children's books with boys as the main characters. This was the case in two other Alcott books, Little Men and Jo's Boys.
- 7 Early in her career someone once told Alcott that she should give up writing and "stick to teaching." It is fortunate that Alcott paid no attention to this misguided person. She knew what she wanted to do with her life—and she did it!

Strawberries

- 1 Several members from the Lansdale Garden Club came to Ben's school to announce a "Container Garden" contest. To enter, a student could grow any type of plant in a pot. In three months, the Garden Club members would return to judge the plants. They would choose winners and award gift certificates for plants and gardening supplies.
- 2 Ben's grandmother loved working in her garden, and her birthday was coming up. If Ben won, he could give her the gift certificate!
- 3 First, he checked out a gardening book from the library. It was full of colorful pictures. There were daisy patches, rose beds, and ponds of water lilies. There were even pansies in pots. None of these inspired Ben. He couldn't decide what he wanted to grow.
- 4 In a shed behind his house, Ben found a bag of potting soil leaning against a wall. Next to the bag was a funny-looking pot. It was knee high and measured about ten inches across the top. Sticking out from the rounded sides of the pot were seven little pockets.
- 5 Ben went back to his gardening book and looked until he found a picture just like it. The pot was called a strawberry jar. The picture showed strawberry plants with dark, fuzzy leaves, tiny white blossoms, and ripe red fruit spilling from the top and the pockets.
- 6 Ben showed his mom the picture and asked, "Can I use the soil and pot that are in the shed? Then I'll only need to buy strawberry plants."
- 7 His mom agreed and drove him to the garden shop. Ben had six dollars he had saved for Grandma's gift. He bought two six-packs of tiny strawberry plants and still had three dollars left.
- 8 At home Ben filled the pot with soil and tucked the long roots of the strawberry plants into the soil-filled top and pockets. Since the plants were newly planted, he watered them every day.
- 9 He was disappointed when the green leaves started turning yellow. In the library book, Ben looked in the chapter called "Troubleshooting." He learned that too much water could cause yellow leaves. The article suggested watering only when the soil felt dry.

- 10 As he reviewed the book, Ben learned that his plants needed more than water. They also needed nutrients to help them grow. Ben's mother had two kinds of plant food. One was for leafy houseplants, and the other was for plants with flowers, fruits, or vegetables. Ben began adding the second kind of plant food to the water for the strawberry plants.
- 11 After a couple of weeks, white flowers began to appear. Ben continued caring for the plants. The day for judging the contest finally arrived. The jar overflowed with healthy green leaves, papery white blossoms, and bright-red strawberries. It was hard for the judges to find a place to attach the deep-blue first place ribbon!
- 12 Grandma's favorite birthday gift was the pot of strawberries. When she saw the gift certificate, she told Ben they would share it. After all, they were both gardeners now!
- 27 The author included the second paragraph because it —

  - D shows how long the contest will last
- 28 In paragraph 3, the word inspired means —

What's for Dinner?

Rhonda Spatz Darnell

Zookeepers work hard to keep the animals happy and healthy.

- 1 Clatter, clank, chop-chop. It's early morning, and the Sacramento Zoo will not open for a few hours. But feeding the animals is a big job, and busy sounds are already coming from the zoo kitchen.
- 2 Fresh fruits and vegetables are being chopped. Ground meat is thawing, and vitamins are being measured out. Live mealworms and frozen crickets and mice are being prepared for some of the zoo animals.
- 3 All of this happens in the zoo kitchen. It is a large room, about three times the size of a household kitchen. The floor is made of cement, so it's easy to hose down. The refrigerator and freezer are big enough to walk into. Twice a week, trucks deliver enough food for 213 animals. It takes ten zookeepers to prepare this food.
- 4 The workers at the Sacramento Zoo care about their animals. They know that their work is important. Zoos help by breeding animals and protecting rare species from dying out. Zoos also make it possible for people to learn about and enjoy wild animals. Zookeepers need to keep zoo animals healthy and happy.
- 5 One of the hardest parts of the job is choosing healthy foods that the animals will like. How do zookeepers know what to feed them? By doing lots of research!
- 6 Scientists study what animals eat in the wild. Zookeepers try to feed zoo animals the same foods, but they might not be easy to find. Then, zookeepers serve similar foods that are just as healthy. For instance, a wild wolf might catch a rabbit for dinner. That wolf eats rabbit meat, bones, and organs. It also eats the plants the rabbit ate that day. So, a zoo wolf must be fed some plants along with its diet of meat, bones, and organs.
- 7 Scientists also study the way animals eat. Some animals like to eat in groups. Others fight over food, so they are fed alone.
- 8 Most zoos belong to groups that study animals and their needs. The zoos in these groups share what they learn with other zoos. For example, a zoo that plans to get a koala can find out what koalas are fed at other zoos. This information will help the zoo keep the new koala healthy.
- 9 Food can also be a zoo animal's entertainment. In the wild, animals spend much of their time looking for food. To prevent zoo animals from getting bored, many zookeepers give them treats to keep them busy. A bear may be given peanuts buried in a box of sand. The bear must sniff and dig to find the peanuts. Chimpanzees may be given sunflower seeds to crack open and eat or frozen treats with fruit inside.
- 10 Zookeepers work hard to keep their animals happy, healthy, and able to breed. And just like humans, animals stay healthy by eating right.
